

Abstract

Plural local event logs of nodes of a computer network are monitored and then stored in a central database. The central database is transferred at customisable, periodic time intervals to a support computer system for analysis of the local event logs. If a potential problem is detected by the support computer system an alert message is generated automatically.